This paper will outline a non-universalist conception of rights as established and justified ways of acting or being acted towards. It draws on Rawls, Foucault and externalist theorists of rights to show that rights can both be historical phenomena, entirely immanent to social, affective and discursive relations, and endowed with normative force.